LITTLE THINGS.

A simple rhyme, a childish grief,
A blossom on a lover's tomb,
A bud expanding into leaf,
A dew-drop in a clover bloom:
How sweet, how sad, how wondrous fair,
How soon forgot, how quick to fade!
The song, the bloom, the infant care,
Pass like the play of sun and shade:

But in their passage quicken thought—
As sunbeams melt on field and plain
And leave their lightest impress wrought:
In blooming grass and ripening grain;
And though each individual form
Grows indistinct, its glow remains,
A halo round us in the storm,
A genial warmth that fills our veins.

The critic comes with awful frown
To crush the poet, like a grub:
Frosts nip the tender blossoms down,
And children grieve for this and that
Are met in some of our large streets:
That wisdom round our frosted heads
And yet we vary with the fate
Is woven of such slender threads:

The little things of time are most
Secure of influence, promise, power:
The flying seed, the insect host,
The great, the small, the transient shower:
They multiply, build up, tear down,
On and on, waste and maintain their
Till nothing is bare nor common-place.

So little merriments, joined in song,
Light bubbles that in music break—
When youth is glad and days are long,
In low, soft ecstasies, may wake
The living chords of that sweet lyre
Which trembles in the human heart
And prompts the genius to aspire,
The man to note a noble part.

Then, scorner, spare the little things!
From atoms all the worlds are wrought,
Peasants may dwindle into Kings,
Or wits give birth to humorous thought:
The great is small, the small is great;
And yet through all life a varied throng
The truth holds fast as death or fate,
The man to note a noble part.

CHAPTER IV.—CONTINUED.

There is not much out of the common in this narrative to anybody who does not happen to be in love with Miss Farmer, or strongly inclined that way. But to Tregarten the story seemed one of herosm and sorrow, and he thought he could see already some of those inward qualities of which he desired to assure himself. The daughter of a clergyman is conventionally a gentlewoman, and he was already persuaded that Miss Farmer possessed all desirable womanly qualities when he met her for the second time. They had talked commonplace at their first meeting and had been aware of the fact. They talked commonplace now and did not know it, because they spoke of books and art, and nobody believes that he or she can talk commonplace upon those inspiring themes. Miss Farmer's soul declared itself more and more freely to Tregarten's attentive observation, and he was more and more convinced that it was of the right quality and pattern.

The young man had taken apartments for the rest of the summer season at "The George," and Gorbey knew by this time in what pursuit he was engaged. Mr. Tregarten rambled much in the pleasant fields beyond the town, and Miss Farmer, who had a taste for botany and some little knowledge of the science, was indefatigable in exercise. The two young people met on most days, and the little sister was too modest to play propriety, and which was perhaps of more importance, was not enough to know when she was not.

Any wandering butterfly was not enough for a race which at least took this sensible child round a corner of the lane in which her elders strolled.

The searcher after the philosopher's stone had found it, but not where he had expected. Everything had grown golden for him. The simile is poverty-stricken, but there is no simile which will express his physical wealth of a heart which for the first time has given away all its substance.

It was time for lovers' confidences, and they were exchanged. The sensible child had gone full tilt round a leafy corner, and the young man and his sweetheart lingered at a stile. The child, carried with a wonderfully sweet, rollicking fifty yards away, and the elders talked.

"You remember," said Tregarten, "the day on which we first met?"

"Yes," answered, with a delicious shyness. His ardent eyes—she thought she had never seen anything so tender, ardent as they were—and her bashful glance met for a moment, and she blushed.

"I was lying on the grass," he said, "on the top of the cliff above the landing place, when I heard your voice, and it awoke me."

"Was I so boisterous?" she asked, smiling, with her eyes upon the ground.

"No," he answered, with a little tender laugh, which of itself was a lover's flattery, "but it awoke me from a curious dream," he added, with an air of odd reluctance.

"Indeed?" she said, questioning.

"Tregarten began to wish in a vague way that he had not mentioned this. His goddess might not care to know that one of her rarest charms had reminded him of an actress, but having begun, he felt bound to go on; so he spoke with a feigned lightness and looked anywhere rather than at his sweetheart's face.

"I suppose you don't know," he began, "what a lovely voice you have?" She made no reply to this, but still looked demurely on the ground at her feet.

"When I first heard it I was dreaming, and I distinctly heard the words, 'Oh, Jupiter, how weary are my spirits.'"

"That was not strange," she answered, looking up at him. "I spoke them."

"Did you?" he asked, with some confusion. All this seemed to have been said some time ago, and he had to have some unexplained which now again threatened from the near future. Everybody has experienced that curious sensation.

"What was your dream?"

"Oh, my dream!" he answered. "It was nothing. I dreamed I was at the play, and I saw Rosalind upon the stage."

She looked at him swiftly, with a hint of fear and half a hint of resolution in her face. He struck out with a transparent pretence of being perfectly at ease, and cut down a needle with his living-axe.

"Your voice reminded me," he said after a little pause, "of the most beautiful voice I ever heard till then. I even thought I recognized it, and I walked down to meet you, and found that I had made a blunder."

"In meeting me?" she asked.

He laughed again, and his eyes met hers. In hers there was a tender triumph and gaiety which answered her own question fairly well, even without the aid of his, which beamed with admiration.

"No," he answered, "but in dreaming that that lovely voice had descended from the stage," he went on at ease. "And yet the fancy haunted me all day." She was looking up at the ground once more, and with the point of her parasol was turning a little pebble over and over. She stopped so that her face was hidden from him by the wide-brimmed summer hat she wore.

If this were equestrian, the fashion of the day favored it, for the drooping edge of the width of plaited straw was a fringe of fine black lace some two or three inches deep, and he would have had to fall upon his knees to see her face. Could he have seen it he could not have failed to notice how flushed she was, and what a look of fear and shame was in her eyes.

"Who was the lady?" she asked, "whose voice so resembled mine?"

"A Miss Churchill," said Tregarten. "A delightful actress. The most charming actress I ever saw." It seemed necessary to make as much as might reasonably be made of Miss Churchill's perfection to excuse any comparison, however trivial, between her and the woman of his heart.

Who not only was not an actress and was a gentlewoman, but was at all of course, beyond comparison with anybody. "I saw her play Rosalind," he hurried on, "and since the first words I heard you speak, the resemblance of the voices was accidentally heightened."

"Did you wish very much to see Miss Churchill?" asked the young lady. "Were you very much interested in her?"

"Not at all," cried Tregarten, eagerly. "I had forgotten her—until I heard the voice."

"Were you disappointed when you found that it was only—me?"

"Only you!" said the lover, and would not condescend to add to that simple sufficient disclaimer, except by possessing himself first of her hand, and then of her waist. For awhile she bent her head and refused to allow him to steal the merest glance at her face, but by and by she turned upon him gently and gazed full in his eyes for a moment, while her figure yielded itself more freely to his embrace, and no longer repulsed him by its rigid lines.

"If I had turned out to be Miss Churchill," she asked him, "should you—?" She paused, but the very silence was eloquent.

"Have loved you?" said Tregarten. "No. I could not have fallen in love with an actress." It seemed to him that there might be a touch of jealousy in the appeal, and he was in the mood to be tender to all love's fancies, however shadowy and unreal they might be.

"Why not?" she asked. "There are many good women who are actresses, surely."

"No doubt," he answered, lightly. "Many. But you rub the bloom from the peach if you handle it ever so gently. An actress gains something more by possessing herself first of her hand, and then of her waist. For awhile she bent her head and refused to allow him to steal the merest glance at her face, but by and by she turned upon him gently and gazed full in his eyes for a moment, while her figure yielded itself more freely to his embrace, and no longer repulsed him by its rigid lines.

had been an apt and willing pupil, and had learned to love him well. She was of a large and generous nature, affectionate rather than passionate, but inclined to cling to the object of her affection with lifelong tenacity. There are few women who would not have kept garden incessantly rather than run the risk of losing a lover. And Tregarten was the one man in the world to her, as a woman's first love always is—the one possible idol. The mere thought of losing him was cruel beyond expression; the mere fancy that she might sink his love was scarcely bearable. She so honored and revered and loved him that she was forced to deceive him. That is not good morality, but is admirable feminine logic.

The courtship went on, and Gorbey and the county beyond the limits of Gorbey discussed it, and on the whole were content with it. Tregarten might have looked higher in spite of those old regimental "swades" of his, for the last six or seven years of the old houses in that part of England, where houses are so amazingly old, might think himself almost any man's equal. He was not a millionaire, but he had enough, and he was unusually personable. Everybody was persuaded that the man from Miss Farmer's point of view, was all that could be desired.

Within nine months of their first speech with each other the young pair became man and wife, and set up housekeeping in Gorbey. They had an exquisitely appointed house, standing in the midst of some eight acres of well-timbered ground and surrounded by trim grey limestone walls. The old mansion on Tregarten Island was to be restored to something of its former grandeur, and Mrs. Tregarten insisted upon having a hand in this. She insisted on having so influential a hand in it that she placed the whole of her own modest fortune in her husband's hands and bade him make that sum.

"You bring me the grandeur of an old name," she said, "and I claim to have my share in its honors. If you refuse me this I only half divide them."

Tregarten took many affectionate disputes, took the money.

"Whatever is mine is yours," he said, "and whatever is yours is mine. It is like the right hand giving to the left."

"Precisely," said his wife, well pleased, and the architect was busy at once. By the beginning of July the builders were at work, and the young couple had great joy in crossing from Gorbey Head to Tregarten, and watching the slow growth of the old place to a new being. Tregarten's funds were snugly invested, and there were ample means to keep the glorified house in a reasonable state. Meantime, in other matters they were content to retrench, and Mrs. Tregarten wrote industriously at a romance on a large scale, determined not to cost her husband a penny in dresses, and to win by any means, fame, of which he, who alone should have the secret, should be as proud as she was of him.

Visitors came thickly to Tregarten that summer, some who had archaeological tastes, from afar, bent on seeing the house once before it assumed its new form. It was no matter for surprise, therefore, when a couple of sturdy men pulled over a party of ladies and gentlemen, with a fat and spectacled servant at their head, and the fat and spectacled one began to wander about among the stones and the mortar, delivering a little lecture to his followers as he went. The married pair were in the habitable part of the house, and at the moment when the boys pulled over a party of ladies and gentlemen, with a fat and spectacled servant at their head, and the fat and spectacled one began to wander about among the stones and the mortar, delivering a little lecture to his followers as he went.
